Climate change is not defined by nature – climate change is a societal problem. When addressed, it happens under the highly restrictive conditions of an increasingly differentiated, far-from-transparent society composed of logically discrete function systems, egotistical organisations, and capricious interactions. Under these circumstances, climate change is a problem of divergent function systems, organisations with varying agendas and degrees of involvement, and everyday encounters ranging from the dispassionate to the over-committed that, each in their own way, align and collide as they construct climate change. An understanding of these circumstances allows us to grasp how 'society' begins to discern ecological problems and selects specific ways of addressing them while excluding others. This book assembles both theoretical and empirical contributions which offer analyses at the micro, meso, and macro levels.
